Dear Hiring Team,

I am applying for the L.E.K. Insight Programme. As a first-year Political Economy student at King's College London, I am drawn to strategy consulting for a specific reason: the discipline of building conclusions from evidence rather than from assumption. That principle sits at the centre of how L.E.K. operates, and it is what separates the firm from its peers in my mind. Three things from my first year demonstrate how I work:

- Structured problem-solving under pressure.
At EY's spring week, I diagnosed a fictional client's tax position and proposed an Irish holding company restructure that reduced the effective corporate tax rate from 25% to 12.5%, unlocking an estimated £400k to £1m in annual savings. I then led the group presentation, designing a reinvestment framework to compound that efficiency through Full Expensing relief.
- Analytical decision-making with real stakes.
Selected as the only KCL student at a Goldman Sachs-hosted asset management simulation reserved for Imperial College students, I managed a $20m multi-asset portfolio across three simulated quarters, interpreting live macroeconomic signals to generate $1.2m in returns.
- Building something from nothing.
In April 2026, I founded the KCL Alternative Investments Society, recruiting a senior leadership team, growing the Instagram presence to 350+ followers, and attracting 40+ members before our October 2026 launch. Every decision required prioritisation, communication and stakeholder buy-in under real constraints.

L.E.K. appeals to me because of what it actually does, not just what it is. The firm's expansion of its Financial Services practice and its London-led Payments work address exactly the structural questions I find most interesting: how capital flows change as technology, regulation and consumer behaviour collide. The London office is where L.E.K. began in 1983, and it remains one of its largest and most internationally diverse, a culture built around over 30 nationalities working closely together. That environment, combined with the local staffing model and early Associate ownership, makes the Insight Programme the right place for me to stress-test whether this is where I can do my best work.

I would welcome the opportunity to demonstrate that in person on 9–10 June.

Yours sincerely,

Muntasir Ali
